INSTITUTE OF SOUTHERN CULTURE AT LONGWOOD

Farmville.- Virginia natural resources as determined by early explorers, problems in writing and editing textbooks on Virginia history, and an appraisal of the literary works of Ellen Glasgow were discussed July 10 at the summer lecture series of the Institute of Southern Culture held at Longwood College.

Virginia's earliests explorers over-estimated the wealth, size and natural resources of the state, Dr. Gary S. Dunbar told the audience gathered for the morning session of the Institute.

The first explorers who came to Virginia spent much of their time searching for a short route to the Orient. It was erroneously believed by them that the East India Sea was not far away.

This misconception was due to a map drawn by Girolamo Verrazano of the Eastern Seaboard in 1529. On it he made the notation that "From this Eastern Ocean one sees the Western Ocean." Verrazano could have added this footnote as an afterthought to point out something of value which had resulted from an otherwise fruitless voyage, the Longwood geography instructor added.

Round the clock sessions may be called in the Senate, as debate begins on controversial Civil Rights Bil.
